Q: Python - run module at specific time only, avoid scheduling I am developing an application that runs on a server. At each startup of the server, the application needs to start a new process to monitor different metrics. The thing is, this process takes days to finish and I want to avoid scheduling it before my application start running. How can I do that? A: You'll want to set up a cronjob, there is an example here (watch for the link to go to a paypal page, I have deleted the paypal link). The end result should be something like this: /path/to/your/script/my_script.py #!/usr/bin/env python #coding: utf-8 from datetime import datetime # Initialize your class here. def some_function(): print "doing something" class MyClass(): def __init__(self): self.setTime = datetime.now().strftime('%H:%M:%S') def doSomething(self): print "doing something" def doSomethingElse(self): print "doing something else" if __name__ == '__main__': myClass = MyClass() myClass.doSomething() myClass.doSomethingElse() myClass.setTime = "" save it in b7e8fdf5c8
