Pressurized water, commonly referred to as feed water, is used in a wide range of industrial processes. However, during operation of an industrial process using a pressurized water feed line, impurities such as fine sediments and mineral salts may build-up on the interior surface of the feed line, which may clog the line if left unchecked. Typically, the build-up of impurities in a pressurized water feed line is a recurring problem in industrial processes, and has the potential to cause other problems, such as the interruption of the industrial process. The build-up of impurities in a pressurized water feed line can be treated in a variety of ways. For example, fine sediments may be removed by installing filters in the feed line to remove the impurities. However, filters consume cleaning water and can be expensive to operate. Additionally, the filters must be replaced periodically, which can be time consuming and expensive. Alternatively, the build-up of impurities on the interior of a pressurized water feed line can be inhibited by applying a coating to the exterior surface of the line. For example, the exterior surface of the line can be painted or coated with a polymer to prevent the build-up of impurities, or applied with a sealant to prevent the ingress of impurities into the interior of the line. This method has the advantage of using a minimal amount of water to maintain the exterior surface of the line clean. However, when using a polymer coating, the interior surface of the line is in direct contact with the polymer coating. Therefore, the build-up of impurities on the interior of the line remains a concern. The present invention provides an improved method and system for automatically cleaning a pressurized water feed line. More specifically, the method and system of the present invention automatically cleans the pressurized water feed line using cleaning water, which is applied to the exterior surface of the pressurized water feed line to prevent the build-up of impurities
