The invention is particularly useful in the context of persons who, because of injury, are at risk of developing an infected wound. Staphylococcus aureus infections are a significant source of morbidity and mortality among persons with open wounds and among burn victims. Without appropriate infection control procedures, wounds and burns can become an entry point for the transmission of pathogens to human beings. During World War II, the successful prevention of bacterial dissemination from the surface of aircraft in which servicemen were confined was critical to the success of the Allied campaign in Italy. Over 7,000 servicemen were infected with staphylococcus during this campaign. After the surrender of Nazi Germany in 1945, special military hospitals were established to provide wound treatment for the massive numbers of soldiers with battle wounds. Serious infection occurred in a high percentage of these combat casualties. These infections were almost always staphylococcal and resulted in approximately 8% of all deaths in the military hospitals, a figure that may not have been significantly altered by the introduction of antibiotics. Burn wounds commonly harbor staphylococci, which are responsible for burn wound infection. S. aureus is also the most common cause of staphylococcal abscesses in humans. Recent studies have estimated that, after recovery from burn injury, roughly 20% of burn patients continue to have detectable staphylococci in their wounds for several weeks. Staphylococcal infections can be further complicated because S. aureus readily becomes resistant to antimicrobial agents

That's the opinion of the owner of a 2018 second-round draft pick, who says the Cowboys are targeting running backs in the draft, according to ESPN's Dan Graziano. Former NFL executive Bobby Beathard was selling his 2018 second-round pick from Florida State to the Cowboys, and the move comes after Ezekiel Elliott's holdout and some speculation that Elliott may not be back with the Cowboys in 2019. To make room for Beathard on the roster, the Cowboys moved all-pro running back Alfred Morris from injured reserve to the active roster. Morris is a free agent at the end of the season. "I think they want more than one back," Graziano said. "Again, I'm not sure if it's a running back or a receiving back. They have had a lot of use on him [in the slot]. He can run, he's got good hands." More:NFL Power Rankings: Who Will Be No. 1 in 2019? Graziano noted that the Cowboys are not looking to run the ball through those they're targeting in the draft. "I would think that they'd want a guy who can go out there and block," Graziano said. "They've had a lot of success with him, and that is going to be a need. They don't need to put the ball in the guys' hands, they just want them to be good blockers. They have some bigger backs they could draft
