Adobe Illustrator is one of the best vector-based drawing programs available. It's been lauded by top professionals for its robust and versatile tools and quality workmanship. It was not too long ago that Illustrator was just about the only drawing program available. If you had to draw something, you used Illustrator. It's so popular that a study on the history of the most popular publishing software found that 66 percent of the U.S. population couldn't live without it (and that includes those people who work at a publishing company, of course!). Illustrator is particularly useful for creating logos and icons. It was the go-to program for creating the book's iconic cover design. It's a versatile program that enables you to do a lot with simple tools like pens, pencils, and erasers. You can create logos, vector art, three-dimensional effects, typography, illustrations, and web design. You can draw line art with either the Pen tool or using the drawing board. You can create a drawing with the Pen tool by making a selection that you then use to draw lines. You can also draw

Q: Display documents instead of links from Listview I want to display documents inside the Listview in the first column instead of links but couldn't find a solution so far. Please help me, Thanks Here is what I have : function createList(data) { var list = $('#Grid').listview({ orientation:'vertical', itemDataSource: data, itemTemplate: 'griditem.html' }); } and in the view : $(document).on('pagecreate', function(event) { var s = window.location.search.match(/?select=true/i)?/^?select=true/ :/^?select=false/; var page = location.hash.match(s)? location.hash.slice(s.length) : '/'; createList(loadDocument(page)); }); function loadDocument(page) { $.ajax({ type: 'GET', url: '?select=true', success: function(data) { $.each(data, function(i, item) { $('#Grid').listview('append', " + item.title + " ); } ); } }); } Edit : thanks to @disavant I ended up with the following code : function createList(data) { var list = $('#Grid').listview({ orientation:'vertical', itemDataSource: data, itemTemplate: 'griditem.html' }); list.listview('refresh'); list.listview('clearCache'); list

What's New in the?

The Growth of Bogus Pension Studies The Growth of Bogus Pension Studies The graphs show a growth of bogus studies in the past, like those cited in the book "The Trouble With The Aged" (see A falsified graph that was published in the Financial Times [FT] is by now pretty well known. The FT ran a graph that claimed the amount of industrial and scientific pensions in Britain has fallen in 15 years, from a high of 84.6% in 1996 to 79.4% in 2006 (article at and But the real growth of industrial and scientific pensions is much more than 15% in 15 years, and much more than in any OECD member country. And the much higher growth of the falsified graph is significant in itself, as even the conservative FT can not completely deny it. What does that tell us? First, that bogus studies are or at least can easily be published. Second, that bogus studies are then being used to call for austerity- and privatization-policies. In the book "The Trouble With The Aged" ( the author already mentioned the following: "Then there is the issue of ethics. The 77.5 per cent figure has been cited by financial advisers as an argument for drastic cuts in pensions. The reality is that it is highly unlikely that the figure of a fifth of the workforce in the OECD says anything much about the size of the British pension system. It is just another example of the misreporting of statistics used by vested interest groups to achieve political goals." The OECD even acknowledged such lobbying: "Mischel (2004) finds that several reports listed poverty among the elderly as the most important issue and cites studies
