Q: jQuery event handlers only working in console I have a lot of code on my website to handle user events. I decided to move it all to a separate JS file. When the file is loaded in from the web server, all the code works fine. But, when I copied it to a local file, all the event handlers no longer work. I tested the code in the console and all it does is log the code in the console. This is my markup: " id="topButton" title="" style="margin-left:3px;margin-right:5px;display:block;"> " src="" /> " style="margin:10px; margin-left:-80px;margin-right:-10px;margin-top:-20px;background-color:transparent;font-family:'Trebuchet MS', Arial,

Thus, we performed an amino acid sequence alignment of full-length FatA proteins from high- and low-FAT1-expressing fatty acid biosynthesis-derived yeasts, respectively. Sixteen residues in the FatA proteins from Y. lipolytica, including the amino acid residues shown in Fig. 4{ref-type="fig"} to be required for the catalytic activity of FatA, are conserved between the high and low FAT1 expression strain, even though the FatA proteins have 61% identity. Thus, amino acid residues in the N-terminal six C2H2 domains of FatA appear to be responsible for the difference in catalytic activity between yeasts with high- and low-FAT1 expression. Our results clearly demonstrated that overexpression of FAT1 not only decreased the cellular fatty acid content but also accelerated the fatty acid biosynthesis. Therefore, the overexpression of FAT1 accelerates the production of fatty acids in the yeast; thus, the decrease in cellular fatty acid content observed in Y. lipolytica overexpressing FAT1 was expected. It is also obvious that the overexpression of FAT1 affects the substrate preference for the fatty acid biosynthesis in the yeast. Therefore, this study provides a simple assay to screen and identify a heterologous enzyme that has functional activity in the fatty acid biosynthesis of yeasts, such as S. cerevisiae, a simple fatty acid auxotroph. The optimized conditions for cell cultivation employed in this study are appropriate for production of other fatty acids. In particular, unsaturated fatty acids can be synthesized from the common
