The study demonstrates that mutations in a mouse gene called fndc5 can cause severe vision loss. The findings raise the possibility that many inherited eye disorders might have a common genetic origin. The research has been published online in the journal Cell. "Vision is one of the most important senses to humans," says co-researcher Pierre Larochelle, an Associate Professor in the Department of Neuroscience at Université de Montréal and a researcher in the laboratory of Joe Gall at the Centre de Recherche des Instituts de Santé Mentale de Montréal (CRI-ISMMT).

In general, it is known that centrifugal clutches are made of a number of components such as flywheel, clutch disk, and clutch bearing assemblies. The frictional elements are operated such that the frictional surfaces remain in contact with each other. The clutch disk is preferably acted upon by the action of springs and can move radially inward against the action of the springs. The support and holding of the disk in the friction elements is provided by a snap ring and a hub, which are capable of axial and radial movement, respectively. A device of this type is known, for example, from U.S. Pat. No. 5,076,639. This publication shows a clutch assembly that has a disk which is connected to a clutch fork, and a hub which is connected to a hub axle of a vehicle and which is provided with a snap ring. It has been found that these known designs are disadvantageous in that the axial force which is applied is relatively high. It is therefore an object of the present invention to provide a clamping device for the rotor of a centrifugal clutch, which reduces the forces applied. This and other objects are achieved by the present invention which is directed to a device for mounting a centrifugal clutch having a disk
