Using Particle Tracking Velocimetry. The study of microparticles in microfluidic devices is a relatively new field of research that entails using 3-dimensional (3D) motions of the individual particles to assist in probing for the presence of various constituents within the microfluidic channel. In this work, a particle tracking velocimetry system was developed to track the 3D motions of fluorescence-labeled polystyrene microparticles traveling through a glass microfluidic channel. The particles were propelled within the fluid by a steady-state flow generated by the microfluidic design which was modeled in 3D using finite-element-based fluid dynamics. An optical system with high precision was used to acquire fluorescent images of the individual particles and these images were utilized for developing particle tracking velocimetry algorithms to measure their 3D velocity. Experimental results showed that both the 3D velocity and the single-particle trajectory of the microparticles were successfully measured in multiple positions within the microchannel, demonstrating that the imaging system developed in this study can image and track the microparticles as they travel through the microchannel. If there is one thing that should jump out at you as you read this and if you are not married to a man, you are holding him on the side, possibly and you want to give it a go, then there is a reason why you are thinking about this and if that reason has not resulted in you wanting to do it, you are reading this wrong. If you are single, there is a good chance that the reason that you do not want to do it has nothing to do with the man that you are
