Rapid HIV screening strategies have been successful in the general population; yet little information exists about risk behavior practices in the homosexual community. The purpose of the study was to assess individual and interpersonal risk factors for HIV infection among gay men in the Tampa Bay area. A total of 247 subjects were interviewed with a combination of closed and open-ended questions regarding demographic variables, sexual behavior, involvement with prostitution and commercial sex, history of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), and recent drug use. The data were reviewed by a team of primary researchers to determine the frequency of specific acts and participants' attitudes about the role of each practice on risk. The results of this study indicate that all subjects had a high degree of self-perceived need for testing. All subjects had a reported sexual history suggesting the absence of a certain degree of risk that needs to be addressed. Commercial sex was reported by nearly 90% of the subjects, drug use was low, and no subject reported use of methamphetamine or cocaine. This study suggests that homosexual men in the Tampa Bay area are at low risk for HIV infection; however, it was not possible to establish a relationship between specific behaviors and risk. Further development and implementation of AIDS-related public health programs directed at this population is necessary to educate homosexual men on the etiology of AIDS and to increase access to testing and treatment of STD.Q: Linq syntax for excluding rows in a collection I would like to write s
