German Baffled by Putin's 'Star Wars' Satellite Mapping Exercise Mar 20, 2013 The decision by Russian President Vladimir Putin to deploy a new generation of military satellites into space has baffled German officials, prompting authorities to ask Moscow for clarification. German Defense Minister Ursula von der Leyen told the Bild am Sonntag newspaper on Friday that the move comes at a time when the German army is conducting its biggest military exercise for decades, called "Eager Lion," which started on Friday. "The question is, why are they doing this now?" the Bild am Sonntag quoted her as saying. The operation is seen as an attempt by Putin to assert Russia's increased military presence in Europe, with new missile systems including the "Monza" system on a mobile launcher, which can be transported within hours by truck from one of the main military facilities in the Russian Far East, where the system was first tested last year. This week saw the inauguration of the new testing range at the Beloyarsk Radar Station in the Russian Far East. The German newspaper noted that the army, which already has its own satellite network, had planned to launch a new generation of satellites to ensure the continued reliable functioning of the large-scale command and control center and the data and monitoring center, as well as for planning future operations. It seems to be clear what was the most important reason to cancel the planned satellite launches. The sky is our territory and everyone is free to do anything on it. The exercises that are being conducted on the territory of Russia are violations of international law and must be condemned in the strongest terms. I think that some comments that Russia's Military launches today's satellite will not be enough to indicate interest. It seems to me that Russia is either interested in gaining tactical advantage in Europe or trying to steal the space technology from Europe. Either way, it's unprofessional. The European Union and NATO countries have not lost all cooperation on space and in other areas, which Russia is trying to counter. The purpose of the Russian program that it showed today is not for espionage or military purposes. It's to deny freedom of space travel. There will be no one to come back and report on what was the spacecraft. yeah, i think the reason is that the other 2 involved countries in the US/EU theater saw fit to
