Basal layer hyperplasia, dyskeratosis and metaplasia were found in all biopsies and were not characteristic of myositis. Circumscribed stromal ulcers with mucin production were found in 25% of myositis patients and not present in controls. Histological classification of myositis did not correlate with clinical diagnosis. Ultrastructural analysis of muscle biopsies showed alterations suggestive of a degenerative process. Initial clinical experience suggests that oral mucosal biopsy, although of limited value, can be useful in the early diagnosis of myositis.
