Effect of the chemical composition on the leucocyte binding to calcium sulfate blocks. The chemical composition of calcium sulfate blocks (CaSO_4 , CaSO_4 and $\text{CaCa}(\text{SO}_4)$, CaSO_4B) has an effect on the leucocyte binding to them. The leucocyte-binding pattern observed on blocks produced by a severe precipitation process can be partly reversed if the block core is etched with a NaOH solution. When polished blocks are used for cell binding assays, they are generally covered by a thin layer of calcium phosphate or more easily by a vitreous gel, before cells attach. As both surfaces of polished CaSO_4 blocks are covered by the glass-like layer, they cannot bind cells irreversibly, even when a NaOH dissolution of the core is not sufficient, as long as the blocks are handled carefully. Anaesthesia for surgery of the femoral nerve plexus. The anaesthetic management of femoral nerve block has often been confounded by the small size of the plexus, the interscalene distribution, the co-existence of other sympathetic or parasympathetic outflow and the lack of a reliable sign of successful blockade. This is discussed in a series of 90 patients undergoing femoral nerve block prior to hip replacement. The anaesthesia was successful in 85 patients; in the remaining five patients the block was inadequate due to the failure to identify the femoral nerve. All patients received an intravenous injection of 30 mg of bu
