It was built in 1910 by the Third King of Bhutan Ugyen Wangchuck, and was part of a monastery complex that included the Samten Chholing Temple (also known as the Snake Pond Temple, after the pond) and the Norbuling Lamzoe Temple. The Parami Yonten Gonpa is part of the Tashichho Dzong, a fortress-monastery complex, but is a separate building from the Samten Chholing, the Norbuling Lamzoe and the Trak Rimpung Chorten. In the present day, the monastery is maintained by the Department of Religion and Culture of the Government of Bhutan and is open to tourists. There are also 63 monks living at the monastery. History In 1910 the third king of Bhutan Ugyen Wangchuck named the monastery after the novel lewel of the Roof of the World by J. Blundell (London: Hurst and Blackett, 1894), which was made into the film Jewel of the Roof of the World (1928). In the present day, the monastery is maintained by the Department of Religion and Culture of the Government of Bhutan and is open to tourists. There are also 63 monks living at the monastery. The foreman is known as the 'Druk Desi' and is appointed by the Government of Bhutan. Buddhism The temple is built on terraces of sacred soil, a rare phenomenon in Buddhist architecture. The design of the temple follows the Dzong architecture of Bhutan. There are four towers on the four corners of the building. The main tower is high, with seven storeys. The main temple is a five-storied pagoda with a height of. There are fourteen smaller pagodas and lesser chapels surrounding the main temple. The monastery also includes a clinic and a hospital. The upper terraces of the temple were made from local rocks called sillar and are decorated with carvings and paintings. There are makhar statues which are central to the Buddhist practice in Bhutan. The makhar statues are clay models of the heads of the Buddha c6a93da74d
