dzbf 4416be1ce none of those issues are likely to be fixed in a new build of the windows 10 preview, so i am actually a bit concerned that this feature might disappear from future builds. but i suppose they could always make it selectable in future (similar to the driver disable feature) tjv36 g2e9a96b75 the group policy setting gpedit.msc isnt standard. its a 3rd party add-in and if you dont have it, you wont be able to change this policy. i would like to see this changed because its a bit difficult to find and i think it should be standard. but if i were you, i would not downgrade. the gpedit.msc snap-in doesnt work perfectly, as it does not work with w7/win 8 hybrid setup and you need to do a clean install after customizing the policies. and a clean install would overwrite all settings. m2099 ea2b15af1 if you mean in the standalone versions of msdnaa.exe, yes. if you mean if you download the standalone version and extract the contents to a completely different location, yes. if you mean if you have your standalone version of msdnaa.exe, extracted to a completely different location, and you start msdnaa using the windows + r keyboard shortcut, yes. if you mean other weird questions, i can't help you! 8b9087ed595 can you provide me the sha1 hash for this package. there are often times when i'm installing.dev packages and i need to know what the hash is of the.dev package. maybe create a meta package with all the dev packages such that i can install via command line. thanks for your help. fi3c21a09de chkdisk.exe are merely command-line programs (more like batch files). if you right-click their.exe file and select "open file location," you'll find the location where they were installed. so you just use that location in your command (the full path or filename may be different).
