KEYMACRO will turn your PC into a complete software development kit for you. First of all, you need to know that, after the initial installation of the program, you are given the option of installing either free or paid version. You can also choose to have the software operate under both Windows and Mac OS X environments, and the latter is the only option if you have Windows 8 or a later version. Although the main functions of KEYMACRO are centered on the ability of your computer to control your iOS device, you can choose to run certain apps, as well. Such possibilities include the ability to power up/down/suspend/resume an iOS device, run over one hundred games, connect wirelessly to your device, as well as initiate the operation of certain processes via your keyboard. The latter is especially important if you would like to test how your iOS device would react when powering up/down, suspend/resume, or even losing/restoring its battery. Also, if your device is acting strangely, it might help you diagnose the matter quickly. We were pleased with the ability of KEYMACRO to perform these functions as quickly and efficiently as possible, with the ability to repeat them as many times as you wish, even during a continuous session. Added customization features One thing we appreciated about KEYMACRO is the option of easily adding new commands via adding, editing, and deleting commands. For instance, you are given the chance to assign various shortcut keys to functions related to your iOS device. We also liked the fact that you can easily add, edit, and delete commands by browsing their category, with the number of commands per category configurable. Furthermore, you can use the software to remotely connect your iOS device via Wi-Fi or even via mobile internet. The program does not work under Windows XP and later. Installation may take up to an hour, while it can last over several hours if you have any difficulty with the installation. Google Chrome and Microsoft Edge have become the undisputed kings of the web browsers world, and it seems that they are ready to stay there.
