My first impression is to feel like I am 'getting older' as I am not seeing what I had before. This is what Photoshop used to do, at least in the past...well I guess a few things have changed! I have had to use photoshop extensively over the years and the past seems 'backwards'. Can I give an example of what I am talking about - you know some of the camera controls I want to use - these are not available. Camera Controls don't really work yet that I can see! Double-clicking on the list or selecting layer with the Eyedropper tool will take the current adjustment and apply it to the entire Layers panel. Flat-surface layers can be hit-and-miss with the Eyedropper, and it's not recommended that you use the Eyedropper in that way. Dragging on to the top layer, or underneath one, will apply the adjustment to that layer.

When creating a responsive site (a website designed to look its best on a wide range of screen sizes and device orientations), the issue of whether new content or features should be responsive or not is called progressive enhancement. Progressive enhancement is a principle that states that, if a page contains information that isn't visible to a given user, that user should still be able to access that information. The principle is often discussed in the context of web-based applications. A user agent is a piece of software, either a standalone program or a plugin, that acts as an intermediary between a web browser and a web server. For instance, a browser might receive a request from a user and work to understand the request, then send it to a user agent, which might change the request into a form that the user agent sends to the server. The user agent processes what the web server sends it, and then passes this information back to the web browser. User agents are generally used by web sites to allow certain functionality, such as saving a form to a file, real-time questionnaires, or manipulating the web page to change its content. There are many user agents, such as browsers, feed readers, search engines and spam filters (citation needed), and some are more important than others. The creative world is changing.
