Suits me perfectly for shoots with models and talent clients. It takes great daylight and indoor-light photos and video. The autofocus is good and works fast. Some users also notice that it can take a bit too long to focus the lens. It isn't too bad, but I think that it can be improved. Canon offers an excellent product for about $400. The camera looks good, comes with a decent LCD screen, the autofocus system works well, and the WiFi is there. If you shoot mainly landscape and portrait, then this is a camera for you. Nothing more. The Fujifilm X-E1 is a very interesting camera. I liked it, but felt that the autofocus and the metering was a bit off. But that could be the magic pills. I also noted that AF drives the flash down a bit. That's something to be aware of. This is also a big backward step from the X-T10, though, and its predecessor. Subject tracking, being extended, and the hybrid autofocus, which should optimize for both stills and video, wouldn't be here for a loooooong time. But the ISO function is clearly good. A camera that has the money to spend should also have the right to spend it on lens upgrades. The Panasonic GX8 with its 14, 28 and 45 is an excellent option when it comes to high quality lenses. It has a strong low light sensor and a quiet design. You can also use it for movies, because the AVCHD files are very good. I didn't notice any water or dust in the movie that I shot. The autofocus is pretty fast and the build quality is really strong.
